

Work Related Expenses

This checklist is a guide only as results may vary depending on individual circumstances.

Work related deductions are those expenses that taxpayers can claim because they were incurred while performing their work duties.

The expense must:

a) be incurred before 30th June: you must actually incur a work expense before it is allowed as a deduction. For example, a deduction is not allowed for items provided free of charge, or for expenses reimbursed by your employer. The fact that you have received an allowance from your employer (which may or may not be taxed or shown on the payment summary) does not mean an automatic deduction can be claimed against the allowance.

b) satisfy the “nexus test”: there must be a direct nexus (relationship) between incurring the expense and earning your income. No deduction is allowed for an item that is private or domestic in nature (food, drink and shelter), capital in nature or incurred in earning tax exempt income.

c) be substantiated: you are required to obtain and keep written evidence for work related expenses which include car and/or travel records for expenses. Written evidence must be kept for 5 years from the date of lodging your tax return. Every effort should be made to replace lost or missing documentation. Bank statements, credit card statements and a diary can be used to substantiate expenses in some situations.

The following checklist is not an exhaustive list but may help you identify possible work related deductions:
